Scholars focusing on transitional justice in Latin American countries have not considered aspects of economics in their pursuit for justice while activists for economic policies point out such policies would improve underlying inequity in the region (Olsen, Reiter & Wiebelhaus-Brahm 2011).

Olsen, Reiter & Wiebelhaus-Brahm (2011) point out that transitional justice scholars and economic activists both focused on the Latin American region ignore each other’s arguments.

While justice scholars focusing on Latin America focus on human rights issues, economic activists working in the same region “note that transitional justice scholars are blind to important socioeconomic issues” (Olsen, Reiter & Wiebelhaus-Brahm 2011, 523).
